New V13 SP2 is now available! .Anti-Terrorism Constables Make an All-Nighter to Catch Fleeing Villagers Police in India have been very busy lately. First, they rounded up a mob of Hindu extremists and arrested them for vandalizing Hindu temples, and earlier today, Delhi Police created an elaborate, though elaborate, kite-flying and balloon-arresting operation to round up terrorists. But when it comes to protecting India from terror, you can't throw a rock. One of the most important tools for catching terrorists is a baton. It's called an "anti-terrorist constable" in India, and this one took an all-nighter to make sure the village people that fled after the attacks in Gujarat in 2002 weren't still lurking around at night. The officer, Mehtab Singh, is a detective in charge of patrolling the streets and catching criminals. His investigation, he says, is a vital component of his job. "A lot of times we have reports from villagers that something took place nearby at night. We go there to investigate what it is, and after that we link the villagers to security forces." Villagers have complained that the security forces have arbitrarily detained their children and fined them, apparently on the flimsiest of grounds, for not owning a mobile phone. Meanwhile, other villagers have complained about the violence perpetrated against them by the Hindu nationalists. On Thursday, Singh received one such report. This one was from a "man known to be a rich landlord and a leading leader of the Abhinav Bharat," a Hindu outfit that the Indian government claims is a terrorist organization. After conducting his own investigation, he was convinced that it was, indeed, terrorists. "They were carrying large rocks and fired from their guns. They were armed and wore masks," he says. His boss, Assistant Commissioner of Police Sandeep Sejpal, says there have been a slew of such calls over the past few months. He says 6d1f23a050
