Systematic changes of the neocortex induced by occlusion of the superior sagittal sinus. The mouse brain contains the superior sagittal sinus. In contrast, the occurrence of the superior sagittal sinus in the human brain is rare. In humans with chronic ischemic or hemorrhagic cerebral injuries, the superior sagittal sinus is sometimes observed due to dilation or atrophy of the sinus. To investigate whether the superior sagittal sinus is involved in the induction of brain damage, we created a chronic focal cerebral ischemia model by the ligation of the proximal part of the superior sagittal sinus and studied the effects of cerebral ischemia caused by occlusion of the superior sagittal sinus on the brain. In the chronic model, the superior sagittal sinus was occluded bilaterally in mice. We then evaluated the brain damage induced by the chronic cerebral ischemia and analyzed the pathology of the superior sagittal sinus. In the mice treated with the chronic ischemia, the expression of brain-derived neurotrophic factor increased in the cortical area of the ischemic hemisphere. The results of the present study indicate that the ischemic stress induced by occlusion of the superior sagittal sinus resulted in the damage of the neocortex and spreading from the ischemic area to distant sites in the brain. The authors' results suggest that the damaged area and the transition zone between the damaged and uninjured areas are attributable to the lack of blood flow in the superior sagittal sinus. From our special Investigation Series, the world's leading anti-child sexual exploitation activist Kati says about Sweden being a haven for child abusers, she says: "You name the country, they are all there, especially of course the one who is doing the sex business and the politicians are doing their best to protect them.
