The crankshaft system of the internal combustion engine serves to drive a camshaft which acts on the camshaft lobe carrier of a camshaft adjustment. During the operation of an internal combustion engine, it is also common to receive torque on a joint between the camshaft and the camshaft adjustment. During the operation of the internal combustion engine, oil is constantly provided between the camshaft and the camshaft adjustment, which flows from the camshaft adjuster to the shaft bearings of the camshaft. The oil flows, in this process, with the rotation of the camshaft and through the camshaft adjuster. In addition, in order to ensure an effective lubrication of the camshaft adjuster, oil is also provided for the lubrication of the camshaft adjuster, which oil feeds from the camshaft adjuster to the shaft bearings of the camshaft. In many cases, the camshaft adjustment is preferably set on the end of the camshaft. In this case, a tie rod journal protruding from the end of the camshaft and having a bearing support is provided. The camshaft adjuster is set on this bearing support. The camshaft adjustment serves to adjust the timing of the camshaft, so that it can be adjusted relative to the crankshaft. This enables a correction of the phase position of the camshaft relative to the crankshaft, or the rotational angle of the camshaft, relative to the crankshaft. During the operation of an internal combustion engine, the oil used to lubricate the camshaft and camshaft adjustment has a certain temperature, which is above the ambient temperature. This oil is 6d1f23a050
