It has been known that the coupler has some influence on a photographic property. Particularly a representative example of a cyan coupler is 5-pyrazolone type coupler. It has been known that 5-pyrazolone type coupler can provide a favorable image. The optical reflection density of a silver halide photographic material depends not only on the spectral sensitizing dye used but also on the amount of silver halide exposed. Since the amount of silver halide exposed naturally depends on the exposure amount, there has been some problems. For example, a color photographic material requires so-called latent image storage. That is, a halide ion is formed to successively trap latent image silver halide during development. Latent image silver halide trapped in the material is subjected to the next development to form dye during a long time, which causes an increase in aging of the material. It is necessary to decrease the latent image silver halide trapped in the material, thereby to reduce the increase in aging of the material. As a method for decreasing the latent image silver halide trapped in a material, there has been known a method of decreasing the ratio of developed silver to silver halide. It is effective to decrease the ratio of the developed silver. However
