Download Interstellar (2014) in Hindi (480p).The U.S. is in the process of building its first large space telescope — and it's about to go to work on a multibillion dollar research mission to explore a nearby pulsar. The 7-foot-diameter (2.1-meter) NASA/ESA Hubble Space Telescope is making its final adjustments to its featherweight robotic servicing and upgrade mission. Engineers at the mission's mission control center at Goddard Space Flight Center in Greenbelt, Maryland, have begun preparing the Hubble for a 2019 departure for space. The space-based telescope is set to launch into an orbit around the sun on May 25. While the spacecraft's main task is to begin upgrading Hubble's aging equipment and sending the telescope science data that it collects back to Earth, the orbiting observatory also has a second important duty: watching for potential asteroids, comets and other objects that pose a threat to Earth. [NASA's Upgraded Hubble Space Telescope: Photos] In a so-called Earth-observing mission, known as the Wide Field Camera 3 Servicing Mission, Hubble will hunt for minor planets and comets, using its sharp eyes to spot any objects that might threaten Earth — even if they're so far away that it would take a decade for the orbit of the planet to carry the objects closer to Earth. "Asteroids are interesting from an exploration point of view, but asteroids are also important in this respect because they can dramatically change the orbit of our planet," David Dominick, principal investigator of the Servicing Mission for Hubble's Wide Field Camera 3, told Space.com during a
