Previous studies indicated that the development of behavioral depression-like disorders in mice was comparable to that seen in humans with major depression. However, when mice were exposed to various convulsant and/or neuroleptic treatments, there were mild behavioral changes suggesting the occurrence of a minor psychotic component. It was suggested that these changes constitute an animal model of schizoaffective disorder. In the present study, we investigated the effects of the administration of typical and atypical antipsychotics on the development of depression- and/or anxiety-like behaviors in mice. Indeed, all of the atypical antipsychotics used in the present study reversed the development of depression-like behaviors. Furthermore, the acute administration of the atypical antipsychotic risperidone also reversed the development c6a93da74d
