By Brandon Turbeville "I met President Putin. He's a very strong man, a great man. We had a great talk. I really appreciated it, I think it was a beautiful call," Trump said of his November 23 telephone call with the Russian president. Trump did not elaborate on what he meant by "a beautiful call" nor did he say anything about what he and Putin discussed. As we have discussed on Anti-War.com and talked about in many videos, President Trump has no real interest in being the leader of the Western world. He does, however, appear interested in aligning himself with those who actually want to promote and strengthen Western society. Trump recently said that the NATO alliance and the United States should be treated fairly and that the United States should not be paying "far more" to the alliance than other NATO members. The United States should pay its fair share, which is currently 4.2% of all global NATO spending, and have its borders secured at 28,000 feet. The military power of the United States has no need to expand its borders or engage in foreign intervention. The United States should have a military in the Pacific and Atlantic, but it should be used to defend America, not to expand America's border, or carve up nations. President Trump has made it clear that the United States will no longer put its interests ahead of those of Europe, and he has even worked to upgrade relations with Russia and restore the alliance with Iran. Indeed, he appears to be aggressively working toward the destruction of the terrorist state of Israel. The fact that Trump has flipped on the Russia issue is apparent from his comments about the U.N. and NATO. He even called NATO "obsolete" at the time of his remarks. Trump has also said that the United States should defend South Korea and Japan but only to the extent they are willing to defend themselves. They are not only allies of the United States but are major Asian economic powers. Trump's views on NATO and the U.N. suggest that he is positioning America against the other European powers while continuing to support Israel. Many c6a93da74d
