Adobe After Effects - Blending together, to make one cohesive piece, is not an easy feat. Creating that perfect combination of several elements into one cohesive piece requires several tweaks to the different layers in the sequence. Keeping track of what elements are where, and hidden layers with different effects, can be complicated and time consuming. With the new Frame Sequencer feature, now no longer limited to a sub-menu in After Effects, one can simply control layers by adding them to the frame(s) that they are in. With the click of a button, one can connect and animate those layers together, and synchronize clips and effects. Bringing forward some of the most complex animations is easy. For example, in the previous demo, a single undo action was created to transform a star shape, a color swatch of a particular color, and a preset blurred and faded clip. The same effect can be built to a large degree, with the addition of new tools and presets in the new Character Designer.

In order to work with photos, layers, masks, and adjustment layers, you need to add new layers to the original image. By adding layers, you can add custom effects to a photo and make it appear unique next to the other similar images. Also, the layers can be moved or edited in many ways. The use of these unique manipulation tools make the process of editing and creating the image easier and effective. There are three types of masking tools. They are selection masking tools, fill masking tools, and adjustment masking tools. The selection masks are used when you need to clean up the area that you want to edit. A fill tool automatically fills the missing area with the desired color. The third type of masking is the adjustment mask. This tool can be used for adjustments such as shadows, highlights, levels, curves, and perspective. You can use curve adjustment when you want to change the brightness levels in the image to make them similar to a different color channel. There are many types of masks available in Photoshop. The traditional masks are used for the selection of the image area. The selection masks are used when you need to clean up the area which needs to be edited. Fill masks are appended that permanently fill the masked area. The adjustment masks are used for making sure that the change in the selected area is perfect or needs to be tweaked. The adjustment masks can be used to adjust any type of adjustments. Adobe has further extended its namesake layers and masks features with the addition of a new masks and blend modes options. Plus, the automatic adjustment layers for general improvements to photo editing have been integrated within the tool.
